

Parliament should have a say.

There was a general belief in the country that Parliament should have more say in how the country was run. New industries had grown up and there was a new group of people in the land who had wealth now. Parliament was allowed to give the king advice, but he didn't have to listen. The one power did have, was control over money.

